BUILDING YOUR PERFECT PROSPECT PROFILE

1 - Problem Identification Hypothesis

For your target market, identify and create a testable hypothesis around the key problems your market and buyers have.

Stage 1: The "Known/Said Problem" – This is the problem that everyone in the industry knows they have and talks about publicly: at conferences, with competitors and internally.

Stage 2: The "Known & Unsaid Problem" – This is the problem your target markets knows that they have, but doesn't discuss or disclose publicly. This is often related to poor systems, team structure and talent, poor management or overall poor products or company strategy.

Think of this as the problem that a target buyer might tell you in secret, or after a scotch (or three...)

Stage 3: The "Unknown Problem" – This is the problem that you're looking for – a problem that your target market doesn't know or realize that they have, and the problem that once you solve it, makes all their other problems go away.

Identifying the "Unknown Problem" allows you to frame the conversation with your target buyers in a way that you are teaching and leading instead of following the rest of the market.

2 - Brainstorm Lists & Signals

Signals:

What groups or organizations does your buyer belong to?

What events and conferences do they attend?

What third party systems do they use or integrate with, such as CRMs or marketing platforms.

What email system are they using?

Location: Where is the company geographically located?

What is the focus of company? What problem do THEY solve? Who are THEIR clients?

How big or small is your target company?

What causes do they support? ie. Women Who Code, Geek Girl

Who do they perceive as "experts" in the field, and who do they follow? (LinkedIn Groups shown on individual profiles are good for identifying trends in this)

Where do they get their information and education? What books do they read, or websites do they visit?

See

what Facebook pages or sites they follow.
